Bermudez, D., & Maat, M. T. (2006) point out in this article the need for Art Therapy with the Hispanic population. The authors define who is considered Hispanic and give general statistics of the population. Furthermore, the writers state which are the major problems faced by Hispanics, their values, better methods for therapy, benefits and needs. Concluding how Art Therapy is beneficial for this population and what are the needs within the field.

This is a valid source because it covers an important need within the field, and it is written particularly for the Journal of the American Art Therapy Association. The primary type of research was secondary data analysis. Offering a new perspective of previous literature. Moreover, they also used data analysis by sending a survey to Art Therapists that had worked with the Hispanic population. Authors validated their data analysis with the literature found.
